Like, I know a lot of people have a preference for using forensics almost exclusively and using the event details. One thing I'll say about the event details is that, like the thing that Tyler was describing about looking for extra fields in the event details is not necessarily a substitute for having fields. So, like, it would still be better to have another 20 or 40 fields because you can't. When you. Only when you look at the event details, you can only see one event and so you can't compare, you can't scroll and compare 100 events in a moment just visually.

But just one other detail about the event details pane is. It's much better now that it's collapsible. A further improvement would be if we could set a default for what is uncollapsed when we open it and maybe the order of the panels or even like a set of. I guess not really a set of fields that are at the top because that just falls into the table view. But like a particular.

Like. I think often reasons are more common. Like I actually I am. I do heavily use the workspace for reasons, because that's where the reason scores are. And I just find it a bit more convenient sometimes to double click an event than to open up the event details and uncollapse reasons or get to that section.

But if you could by default have the event details open to reasons, then that could be particularly convenient for that. Also, one other fact about

Customizable dashboard for fraud overview 0:02

Participants discuss creating a customizable dashboard for an initial overview of fraud activities across markets. The ideal layout includes graphs showing overall market health, breakdowns by individual markets, and the ability to view data for the last seven days for comparability. They emphasize the importance of being able to quickly identify spikes or anomalies in event numbers and reject rates.
